Excerpt: ... thousand sulphur, and two thousand two-crop; they were perfectly healthy, the white having completed their labours in twenty-six days, the sulphur and two-crop, in twenty-nine days, produced twentyeight pounds of cocoons, or if flossed, two and one-half bushels; it requiring eleven pounds, or twenty-eight hundred of the white and sulphur, and forty-four hundred of the two-crop, to the bushel. I selected twenty-five pounds of the best cocoons for eggs, which produced twenty ounces of pure eggs; by counting I found that one ounce contained thirty-six thousand eggs. The remaining three pounds of cocoons I reeled, they being of an inferior quality produced but four ounces of silk, it requiring at that rate, twelve pounds of cocoons for one pound of silk. The worms having required five hundred and seventy-one pounds of leaves, the waste and dry leaves being included, according to my best knowledge, it requiring, at that rate, twenty and one-half pounds of leaves, to produce one pound of cocoons, or two hundred and eighteen pounds of leaves to produce one pound of reeled silk; it requiring ten pounds ten ounces of cocoons to make one pound of silk, as I ascertained by reeling my next crop of cocoons. I exposed on the 5th of August eighty-five thousand eggs, of which, about seventy-five thousand hatched; they were likewise perfectly healthy, and on the fifth of September, a few thousand commenced winding; on the sixth, several thousand having wound. The remainder were unfortunately destroyed, in the following manner: my leaves were kept in a cellar which was also used for other purposes, a quantity of salt fish were taken from a barrel and hung to the beam, which pressed on the leaves, and when the worms were fed for the last time in the evening, it being dark, ...
